

I remember the days of playing school while I was growing up, teaching my toys and animals in my basement classroom. However, when I first went to college, I earned a Bachelor of Arts in Political Science and became a contract manager for a major corporation supporting our Government's IT services. During a break from working, I went back and earned my Masters in Education from Liberty University. This has led me to teaching math here at Holy Cross for the last five years.

I grew up in Williamsburg, then moved to Northern Virginia for school. I lived there until I had my first child and we moved to Fredericksburg. At this time I became a stay-at-home mother and took on the job of raising and teaching my children until they were old enough to attend school. Now I have one child still attending Holy Cross with the older three having moved on to high school and college.

In my time away from the school, I am usually at a soccer field as all of my children play competitively. Otherwise, we can be found enjoying our many animals and being outside.
